With the expansion of the Human Genome Project (HGP) and the increasing availability of the technology necessary to analyze it, the quantity of data available has increased at an exponential rate. For example, while in 1995 the size of the human genome was known to be about 3.0 billion DNA base pairs, in 2000 that figure had been surpassed to nearly 3.2 billion DNA base pairs. As the quality of data continues to improve, the size of the dataset is expected to increase even further. Thus, for example, data gathered for the HGP as of the year 2000 alone is expected to be four times as large as that currently available. It is anticipated that advances in computing technology will allow the entire human genome sequence to be determined in a matter of a few years. However, that sequence will contain, in addition to the 3.2 billion base pairs of DNA, approximately an equal number of base pairs of associated non-protein coding material such as messenger RNAs (mRNAs) and non-coding RNAs (ncRNAs 2d92ce491b
