Canon. DigitalIn order to create the electrical connections that will allow the connection of electronic circuits or other electrical devices to be made, it is necessary to electrically interconnect the pins of the electronic circuit or device with the pins of the connectors. These connectors are usually electrically connected to the printed circuit boards upon which the electronic circuits or devices are mounted and which are then connected to each other by wires that are soldered to the pins of the connectors and to the pins of the electronic circuits or devices. One very desirable feature of such connectors is that the pins be easily removable in order to allow their separation and repositioning of the electronic circuits or devices. A second desirable feature is that the pins be easily removable to allow for cleaning of the pins of the connector in order to prevent the buildup of corrosion and/or other debris on the surface of the pins. In order to achieve these desirable features, some connectors have been made which employ a threaded pin in combination with a separate threaded body or housing in which the pin is housed. The pin is threaded into the housing and a nut is provided to prevent the pin from being removed from the housing. One example of such a connector is shown in U.S. Pat. No. 3,797,670 to Otto. The pin in this connector is threaded through the end of a mounting member and through the threaded body. A set of internal washers are used to prevent rotation of the pin relative to the body. A nut is provided to prevent rotation of the pin relative to the body. This type of connector has several problems. First, the nut is required in order to prevent rotation of the pin relative to the body. This necessitates the assembly of the connector in two separate operations. One operation is to assemble the threaded pin with the threaded body. The second operation is to assemble the nut
