I was reading about mutexes and came across this statement: If a thread holds the mutex then it owns the critical section, meaning that when it is in the critical section (at least from the reader's point of view) it owns the mutex. However, the other threads do not have to lock the mutex if they would have to. I'm just curious to know if this is true. My understanding is that once a thread acquires the mutex, it is locked forever and can not be
